

Where I'd Rather Go: More Essays Beyond the Comfort Zone

Where we'd rather go. Where is that? Usually we don't know. We seek. Try our best guess. We take wrong turns, convinced that the thing we want most is out there, somewhere, in the distance. And sometimes, what we want or need seeks us out. In Nonvella's second anthology, three great writers reveal their transits into unexpected realities. In East Detroit Chris Koentges encounters devotees of a literally oddball sport called featherbowling, and finds camaraderie, hope and intimations of eternity. David James Duncan travels from his backyard trout creek to the Orion Nebula and back again, outing himself as a closet mystic. And Susan Olding appraises the heroine of Tolstoy's epic Anna Karenina as she confesses and contemplates her own affair with her legal ethics professor.

Colloquially, the opposite of one's comfort zone is one's danger zone. You are now out of your comfort zone. I know, I'll get a little more money from the cash machine--just a hundred bucks and no more, and if I haven't gotten I know I said I'd leave if I lost the hundred, but I just KNOW I can pull ahead.
