Napoleons troops flooded across the German lands and brought the thousand-year existence of the Holy Roman Empire to a swift end. While plundering the capital of the southern German Duchy of Bavaria, Munich, they hauled off an astonishing battle-scene painting. Created three centuries earlier in nearby Regensburg, it depicted the ancient clash of Alexander the Greats forces with his Persian foes. Soon the painting could be found in the hallowed halls of the Louvre, where a visiting German critic was left marveling at this small world of a few feet [a] painted Iliad. Europes new Alexander clearly agreed because when Prussian troops stormed Napoleons residence in 1814 they found the Alexanderschlacht adorning his walls. Long before, Albrecht Altdorfer had painted this magnificent work for a different noble, Wilhelm IV the Duke of Bavaria, in 1529. In many ways it was the crowning achievement of a prestigious career that was as much civic as it was artistic. Altdorfer had passed up the chance to be mayor in order to complete his masterpiece. But when, many years later, workmen stumbled across his tombstone in Regensburgs Augustinian church, they found the inscription identifying Altdorfer as baumeister; he oversaw the construction and restoration of buildings in the city. As a Free Imperial City since the 1200s, Altdorfers home town of Regensburg was, despite being surrounded by Bavarian territory, answerable only to the Holy Roman Emperor himself. One of the privileges of Regensburg's status was the ability to elect its own council-members and Altdorfers fellow-citizens so honoured him for two decades. And, although he did not experience French intruders, his tenure contained some of the most troubled and dramatic years in German history. (cont.)
