

Bury Me in West Virginia: Memoirs of a Mountaineer

Mike Snyder (b.1939) lives on a trout stream deep in the Appalachian Mountains of West Virginia. He became a back to the land blacksmith who tended sheep on a remote farm, grew his own food, hunted and fished for the table and started a successful fly fishing school after leaving the mainstream in 1971. A self-proclaimed contrarian, readers are treated to Snyders post-WWII boyhood adventures in Clarksburg a prosperous West Virginia glass-making town, his perpetual troubles with teachers, a knack for putting himself in places he shouldn't, and living in terror of the haunter of the hills known to local boys as Clobberfoot and many other tales from time past.

You will view late 50s and early 60s West Virginia University life seen from the perspective of a fraternity man, to the Marines, and knapsack days traveling from Norway to Spain and the Canary Islands. We follow his path to writing jobs in New York, California and his home state driving a night taxi in Aspen, Colorado for the skiing and fly fishing and a spectators view of hippie life in the late sixties.

He fought strip mining in the Mountain State, survived an attempt on his life, became a Charleston Gazette reporter, was accepted into law school but became a traditional blacksmith to live as a mountaineer when he followed his heart far into the mountains. He learned the old ways from blacksmiths, wood-hicks, miners, moonshiners and rural Mennonites.

After a decade, he returned to graduate school at WVU and spent more than two gratifying decades teaching learning-challenged youths from the hollers and back roads. Snyder and his wife Jill live austere lives near Canaan Valley without television and cell phones. They raised two children who became top scholars and achieved professional success in architecture and education. The author also informs readers with accounts of his ancestor who was captured by Indians during the French and Indian War and his German, Scotch-Irish and Welsh forebears who forged lives in early West Virginia.
