

Will he be taking the condo...or her? Susan Christopher has a passion for architecture—old buildings in particular—so selling condos in a restored Nob Hill, San Francisco mansion is the perfect job for her. What she hadn't counted on was having to deal with an Englishman who'd gotten himself knighted for designing and building really fast cars. Sir Peter Breit has “requirements,” and she has to fill every one of them if she hopes to keep her job. Worse, the man turns out to look like the reincarnation of a Greek god. Even worse than that, he expects her to move into the condo with him. How is she to maintain her professional demeanor living in luxury and sleeping down the hall from a man like that? Sir Peter Breit is in San Francisco for business, not for pleasure. Besides, he never toys with his employees. But Susan Christopher's youth and optimism intrigue him, and...he can't deny it...he has a very male reaction to her lush curves. When she seems intent on taking their relationship out of the professional and into the intimate, can he convince her to keep things casual between them? Can he convince himself? Will the beauty of the Bay Area seduce both of them into making their relationship something more permanent? And how will they deal with the fact that their dreams are in competition for the same piece of San Francisco property?
